Rabinowitch, Sanford. Cape Krusenstern National Monument is a coastal plain with big lagoons, backed by gently rolling, limestone hills. Archeological sites trace 4,500 years of human use of its coastline by prehistoric peoples who occupied it seasonally to hunt marine mammals, especially seals. As big storms and regular wind and wave action formed new beach ridges, camps were made on those close to the water. Oldest sites are on beach ridges farthest from the ocean. Over centuries this made a timeline giving a definite, datable outline of northwest Alaska's cultural succession and development. The Cape Krusen...
