This new translation of the New Testament was for the most part more literal, and more formal in tone, but in some respects it was made less literal, for the sake of "inclusive" language. The Book of Psalms was similarly revised in 1991. This manner of presenting the text was actually mandated by certain liturgical guidelines issued by a committee of the U.S. Catholic Conference in 1990, (4) but it was specifically disallowed by the provisional norms for translation of biblical texts sent by Vatican officials to American Bishops in June of 1997, (5) and also disallowed by the translation guidelines formally promulgated in an. At present, three translations are approved for Catholic liturgical use: the New Jerusalem, the RSV, and the New American Bible (NAB).
