Research approaches to identity construction. Liberal, postmodern thought identifies the work of Jacques Derrida, among others, as denying the individual his or her cultural, national, and religious values as reference points for self-identification for expressly "humanistic" reasons. In his book, Agamben strongly opposes any identity, calling for the creation of a new vision of the future, where singularity, devoid of any identifications, will be considered a unit: "Whatever singularities cannot form a 'societas' because they do not possess any identity to vindicate nor any bond of belonging for which to seek recognition."[3] In his opinion, a man of the.

INTRODUCTION. Working within an organization necessarily entails negotiating and performing identity. We can most easily illustrate what we mean by "negotiation" and "performance" with examples. Take a hypothetical organization that values effort and awards promotions to those who demonstrate it. As others have observed, identity is formed, or socially constructed, through a series of interpolations (or negotiations). See, e.g., Homi K. BHABHA, THE LOCATION OF CULTURE (1994); JUDITH BUTLER, BODIES THAT MATTER (1993); BRUCE WILSHIRE, ROLE PLAYING AND IDENTITY (1982); Cheryl I. Harris, Whiteness as Property, 106 HARv. & Time to construct positive identities: display questions in post observation teacher feedback. Article. Full-text available. Mar 2019. Helen Donaghue. This article focuses on the use of display questions to construct positive identities in post observation feedback talk between in-service English language teachers and a supervisor. In jobs of all types, who we are at work is a constantly shifting negotiation between how we are treated and seen by others, the workplace as a social space, our past experiences and our own expectations. Considering young women's work identities reveals how power and privilege operate in the workplace, and the possibilities of young women's agential challenges to inequitable workplace norms and a precarious labour market.
