Calling All Reptiles! â€“ Storms figure greatly in Williamsâ€™s work and in all the Night of the Iguana iterations, and as we see here, they have literary associations that connote apocalyptic turning points that carry within them the hope of release. All that will be needed to carry out the stormy climax of the story is the captive iguana to signify the key charactersâ€™ plight that they are all in their own way at the end of their ropes. So when the iguana finally made its entrance and, I continued reading, I could see why it was there and also its importance. Day of the Iguana â€“ is the third book in the Hank Zipper series by Henry Winkler and Lin Oliver. It was first published in 2003 by Grosset Dunlap. Working as a cut-rate travel guide, defrocked, alcoholic Episcopalian Reverend T. Lawrence Shannon (Richard Burton) leads a busload of American teachers, all middle-aged Baptist women, down the Mexican coast while attempting to deal with his own life's failures. The leader of the group, Judith Fellowes (Grayson Hall), is accompanied by her ward, the teenage nymphet Charlotte Goodall (Sue Lyon), who openly flirts with Shannon, and Judith threatens to get him fired. Like Chekhov, Williams offers a hymn to human endurance. While I admire his compassion for four wrecked souls, the most problematic character is Shannon, whom I find it difficult to like. Clive Owen, in dilapidated white linen suit, plays him with the right nervous intensity, signalled by a shaking right hand. Even if her accent occasionally veers from old Scotland to New England, Williams renders Hannahâ€™s account of her two brief sexual encounters with a deeply touching acceptance of the waywardness of human passion.
