social and religious perceptions of the ship in Bronze Age northern Europe; the heritage management of boats; the social role of the ship and the sea in Bronze Age Norway. The discovery of the well preserved remains of a Bronze Age boat in Dover in 1992 was one of the most important post-war archaeological finds in Britain, and an event of national and international archaeological and historical significance. The ship is the transport of the sea, and has therefore been surrounded by rituals that ensure the success of the journey. As such, the ship has a prominent symbolic role in the Bronze Age conceptual world, as shown recently by Tore Artelius Bronze Age boat is one of fewer than 20 Bronze Age boats so far found in Britain. It dates to 1575–1520 BC, which may make it the oldest substantially intact boat in the world (older boat finds are small fragments, some less than a metre square) though much older ships exist, such as the Khufu ship from 2500 BC. The boat was made using oak planks sewn together with yew lashings. This technique has a long tradition of use in British prehistory; the oldest known examples are the narrower Ferriby Clark, P (ed) 2004. The

This large 3,500 year old wooden boat traded across the channel in the Bronze Age. In 1992, the perfectly preserved remains of a large prehistoric boat were discovered six metres below the streets of Dover. As a piece of complex technology that has survived almost intact, it reveals much information about Bronze Age people in Britain, their society, and the landscape they lived in. It is evidence of a culture that straddled the English Channel during the Bronze Age, trading and profiting from the passage. This large 3,500 year old wooden boat traded across the channel in the Bronze Age. Comments are closed for this
